Customer Reviews

The introduction to this fine series asks the same question that many students ask: Why do we have to learn about history? It's even honest when it says that most young people aren't satisfied with the usual answer about learning lessons from the past. A more engaging idea is that history is about stories, and here the series shines as it provides contemporaneous writing as well as work by scholars that offer plenty of drama and lots of facts, too. In Aztec Civilization, Nardo gives a complete look at this impressive society, with special attention to its beginning, and, of course, its ignoble fall. The role of women is especially interesting. The series provides a solid time line, plenty of photographs, sourced quotes, and a list of books and websites for further investigation. Excellent for reports and research. Grades 6-9. --Ilene Cooper
